Birthday Girl

BY HARUKI MURAKAMI

Translated from the Japanese by Jay Rubin

She waited on tables as usual that day, her twentieth birthday. She always worked on Fridays, but if things had gone according to plan on that particular Friday, she would have taken the night off. The other part-time girl had agreed to switch shifts with her as a matter of course: being screamed at by an angry chef while lugging pumpkin gnocchi and seafood fritto to customers' tables was no way to spend one's twentieth birthday. But the other girl had aggravated a cold and gone to bed with unrelenting diarrhoea and a temperature of 104°, so she ended up working after all at short notice.

She found herself trying to comfort the sick girl, who had called to apologise. "Don't worry about it," she said. "I wasn't going to do anything special anyway, even if it is my twentieth birthday."

And in fact she was not all that disappointed. One reason was the terrible argument she had had a few days earlier with the boyfriend who was supposed to be with her that night. They had been going out since high school. The argument had started from nothing much but it had taken an unexpected turn for the worse until it became a long and bitter shouting match – one bad enough, she was pretty sure, to have snapped their long-standing ties once and for all. Something inside her had turned rock-hard and died. He had not called her since the bust-up, and she was not about to call him.

Her workplace was one of the better known Italian restaurants in the tony Roppongi district of Tokyo. It had been in business since the late '60s and, while its cuisine was hardly cutting edge, its high reputation was fully justified. It had many regular customers and they were never disappointed. The dining room had a calm, relaxed atmosphere without a hint of pushiness. Rather than a young crowd, the restaurant drew an older clientele which included some famous actors and writers.

The two full-time waiters worked six days a week. She and the other part-time waitress were students who took turns working three days each. In addition there was one floor manager and, at the register, a skinny, middle-aged woman who had apparently been there since the restaurant opened – literally sitting in the one place, it seemed, like some gloomy old character from Little Dorrit. She had exactly two functions: to accept payment from the customers and to answer the phone. She spoke only when necessary and always wore the same black dress. There was something cold and hard about her: if you set her afloat on the night-time sea she would probably sink any boat that happened to ram her.

The floor manager was perhaps in his late forties. Tall and broad-shouldered, his build suggested that he had been a sportsman in his youth, but excess flesh was now beginning to accumulate on his belly and chin. His short, stiff hair was thinning at the crown, and an ageing bachelor smell clung to him – like newspaper that had been stored in a drawer with cough drops. She had a bachelor uncle who smelled like that.

The manager always wore a black suit, white shirt and bow tie – not a snap-on bow tie, but the real thing, tied by hand. It was a point of pride for him that he could tie it perfectly without looking in a mirror. He performed his duties adroitly day after day. They consisted of checking the arrival and departure of guests and keeping abreast of the reservation schedule, of knowing the names of regular customers and greeting them with a smile, lending a respectful ear to any complaints that might arise, giving expert advice on wines and overseeing the work of the waiters and waitresses. It was also his special task to deliver dinner to the room of the restaurant's owner.

"The owner had his own room on the sixth floor of the same building where the restaurant was," she said. "An apartment or office or something."

Somehow she and I had got onto the subject of our twentieth birthdays – what sort of day it had been for each of us. Most people remember the day they turned 20. Hers had been more than ten years earlier.

"He never, ever showed his face in the restaurant, though. The only one who saw him was the manager. It was exclusively his job to deliver the owner's dinner to him. None of the other employees even knew what he looked like."

"So, basically, the owner was getting home delivery from his own restaurant."

"Right," she said. "Every night at eight, the manager had to bring dinner to the owner's room. It was the restaurant's busiest time, so having the manager disappear just then was always a problem for us, but there was no way around it because that was the way it had always been done. They'd load the dinner onto one of those trolleys that hotels use for room service, the manager would push it into the lift wearing a respectful look on his face, and 15 minutes later he'd come back, empty-handed. Then, an hour later, he'd go up again and bring down the trolley with the empty plates and glasses. Every day, like clockwork. I thought it was really weird the first time I saw it happen. It was like some kind of religious ritual, you know? But after a while I got used to it and I never gave it a second thought."

The owner always had chicken. The recipe and the vegetable side dishes were a little different every day, but the main dish was always chicken. A young chef once told her that he had tried sending up roast chicken every day for a week just to see what would happen, but there was never any complaint. A chef wants to try different ways of preparing things, of course, and each new chef would challenge himself with every technique for chicken that he could think of. They'd make elegant sauces, they'd try chicken from different suppliers, but none of their efforts elicited a response: they might just as well have been throwing pebbles into an empty cave. In the end, every one of them gave up and prepared a run-of-the-mill chicken dish for the owner every day. That's all that was ever asked of them.

Work started as usual on her twentieth birthday, November 17. It had been raining on and off since the afternoon and pouring since early evening. At 5 p.m. the manager gathered the employees together to explain the day's specials. Servers were required to memorise them word for word and not use written notes: veal Milanese, pasta topped with sardines and cabbage, chestnut mousse. Sometimes the manager would play the rôle of a customer and test them with questions. Then came the employees' meal: waiters in this restaurant were not going to have growling stomachs as they took diners' orders!

The restaurant opened its doors at six o'clock, but, due to the downpour, guests were slow to arrive and several reservations were simply cancelled. Ladies didn't want their dresses ruined by the rain. The manager walked around, tight-lipped, and the waiters killed time polishing the salt cellars and pepper mills or chatting with the chef about cooking. She surveyed the dining room with its single couple at a table and listened to the harpsichord music flowing discreetly from ceiling speakers. A deep smell of late autumn rain worked its way into the restaurant.

It was after 7.30 when the manager started feeling sick. He stumbled over to a chair and sat there for a while, holding his stomach as if he had just been shot. A greasy sweat clung to his forehead. "I think I'd better go to hospital," he muttered. For him to be taken ill was a most unusual occurrence: he had never missed a day since he started working in the restaurant over ten years earlier. It was another point of pride for him that he had never been absent through illness or injury, but his painful grimace made it clear that he was in very bad shape.

She stepped outside with an umbrella and hailed a taxi. One of the waiters held the manager steady and climbed into the car with him to take him to a nearby hospital. Before ducking into the taxi the manager said to her hoarsely, "I want you to take a dinner up to room 604 at eight o'clock. All you have to do is ring the bell, say 'Your dinner is here,' and leave it."

"That's room 604, right?" she said.

"At eight o'clock," he repeated. "On the dot." He grimaced again, climbed in, and the taxi drove away.

The rain showed no signs of letting up after the manager had left and customers arrived only at long intervals. No more than one or two tables were occupied at a time, so if the manager and one waiter had to be absent, this was a good time for it to happen. Things could get so busy that it was not unusual for even the full compliment of staff to have trouble coping.

When the owner's meal was ready at eight o'clock, she pushed the room-service trolley into the lift and rode up to the sixth floor. It was the usual meal for him: a half-bottle of red wine with the cork loosened, a thermal pot of coffee, a chicken entrée with steamed vegetables, rolls and butter. The heavy aroma of cooked chicken quickly filled the lift. It mingled with the smell of the rain. Water droplets dotted the lift floor, suggesting that someone with a wet umbrella had recently been aboard.

She pushed the trolley down the corridor, bringing it to a stop in front of the door marked "604". She double-checked her memory: 604. That was it. She cleared her throat and pressed the doorbell.

There was no answer. She stood there for a good 20 seconds. Just as she was thinking of pressing the bell again, the door opened inwards and a skinny old man appeared. He was shorter than she was, by some four or five inches. He wore a dark suit and a tie. Against his white shirt, the tie stood out distinctly, its brownish-yellow colouring like withered leaves. He made a very clean impression, his clothes perfectly pressed, his white hair smoothed down: he looked as though he was about to go out for the night to some sort of function. The wrinkles that creased his brow made her think of deep ravines in an aerial photograph.

"Your dinner, sir," she said in a husky voice, then quietly cleared her throat again. Her voice grew husky whenever she was tense.

"Dinner?"

"Yes, sir. The manager felt sick all of a sudden. I had to take his place today. Your meal, sir."

"Oh, I see," the old man said, almost as if talking to himself, his hand still perched on the doorknob. "Sick, eh? You don't say."

"His stomach started to hurt him all of a sudden. He went to hospital. He thinks he might have appendicitis."

"Oh, that's not good," the old man said, running his fingers along the wrinkles of his forehead. "Not good at all."

She cleared her throat again. "Shall I bring in your meal, sir?" she asked.

"Ah yes, of course," the old man said. "Yes, of course, if you wish. That's fine with me."

If I wish? she thought. What a strange way to put it. What am I supposed to wish?

The old man opened the door the rest of the way and she wheeled the trolley inside. The floor had short, grey wall-to-wall carpeting with no area for removing shoes. The first room was like a large study, as though the apartment were more a workplace than a residence. The window looked out on the nearby Tokyo Tower, its steel skeleton outlined in lights. There was a large desk by the window and beside it, a sofa and two leather armchairs. The old man pointed to the Formica coffee table in front of the sofa. She arranged his meal on the table: white napkin and silverware, coffee pot and cup, wine and wineglass, bread and butter and the plate of chicken and vegetables.

"If you would be kind enough to set the dishes in the corridor as usual, sir, I'll come to get them in an hour."

Her words seemed to snap him out of an appreciative contemplation of his dinner. "Oh yes, of course. I'll put them in the corridor. On the trolley. In an hour. If you wish."

Yes, she replied inwardly, for the moment that is exactly what I wish. "Is there anything else I can do for you, sir?"

"No, I don't think so," he said, after a moment's consideration. He was wearing black shoes polished to a high sheen. They were small and chic. He's a stylish dresser, she thought. And he stands very straight for his age.

"Well, then, sir, I'll be getting back to work."

"No, wait just a moment," he said.

"Sir?"

"Do you think it might be possible for you to give me five minutes of your time, miss? I have something I'd like to say to you."

He was so polite in his request that it made her blush. "I . . . think it should be all right," she said. "I mean, if it really is just five minutes." He was her employer, after all. He was paying her by the hour. It was not a question of her giving or his taking her time. And this old man did not look like a person who would do anything bad to her.

"By the way, how old are you?" the old man asked, standing by the table with arms folded and looking directly into her eyes.

"I'm 20 now," she said.

"Twenty now," he repeated, narrowing his eyes as if peering through some kind of crack. "Twenty now. As of when?"

"Well, I just turned 20," she said. After a moment's hesitation, she added, "Today is my birthday, sir."

"I see," he said, rubbing his chin as if this explained a great deal for him. "Today, is it? Today is your twentieth birthday?"

She nodded.

"Your life in this world began exactly 20 years ago today."

"Yes, sir," she said, "that is correct."

"I see, I see," he said. "That's wonderful. Well, then, Happy Birthday."

"Thank you very much," she said, and it dawned on her that this was the first time all day that anyone had wished her a happy birthday. Of course, if her parents called from Oita, she might find a message from them on her answering machine when she got home from work.

"Well, well, this is certainly a cause for celebration," he said. "How about a little toast? We can drink this red wine."

"Thank you, sir, but I couldn't, I'm working now."

"Oh, what's the harm in a little sip? No-one's going to blame you if I say it's all right. Just a token drink to celebrate."

The old man slid the cork from the bottle and dribbled a little wine into his glass for her. Then he took an ordinary drinking glass from a glass-doored cabinet and poured some wine for himself.

"Happy Birthday," he said. "May you live a rich and fruitful life, and may there be nothing to cast dark shadows on it."

They clinked glasses.

May there be nothing to cast dark shadows on it: she silently repeated his remark to herself. Why had he chosen such unusual words for her birthday toast?

"Your twentieth birthday comes but once in a lifetime, miss. It's an irreplaceable day."

"Yes, sir, I know," she said, taking a cautious sip of her wine.

"And here, on your special day, you have taken the trouble to deliver my dinner to me like a kind-hearted fairy."

"Just doing my job, sir."

"But still," the old man said with a few quick shakes of the head. "But still, lovely young miss."

The old man sat in the leather chair by his desk and motioned her to the sofa. She lowered herself gingerly onto the edge of the seat, the wineglass still in her hand. Knees aligned, she tugged at her skirt, clearing her throat again. She saw raindrops tracing lines down the window-pane. The room was strangely quiet.

"Today just happens to be your twentieth birthday and on top of that you have brought me this wonderful hot meal," the old man said as if reconfirming the situation. Then he set his glass on the desktop with a little thud. "This has to be some kind of special convergence, don't you think?"

Not quite convinced, she managed a weak smile.

"Which is why," he said, touching the knot of his withered-leaf-coloured tie, "I feel it is important for me to give you a birthday present. A special birthday calls for a special commemorative gift."

Flustered, she shook her head and said, "No, please, sir, don't give it a second thought. All I did was bring your meal the way I was instructed to."

The old man raised both hands, palms towards her. "No, miss, don't you give it a second thought. The kind of 'present' I have in mind is not something tangible, not something with a price tag. To put it simply," he placed his hands on the desk and took one long, slow breath, "what I would like to do for a lovely young fairy such as you is to grant a wish you might have and to make that wish come true. Anything. Anything at all that you wish for – assuming that you do have such a wish.”

“A wish?” she asked, her throat dry.

“Something you would like to have happen, miss. If you have a wish – one wish, I’ll make it come true. That is the kind of birthday present I can give you. But you had better think about it very carefully because I can grant you only one.” He raised a finger. “Just one. You can’t change your mind afterwards and take it back.”

She was at a loss for words. One wish? Whipped by the wind, raindrops tapped unevenly at the windowpane. As long as she remained silent, the old man looked into her eyes, saying nothing. Time marked its irregular pulse in her ears.

“I have to wish for something, and it will be granted?”

Instead of answering her question, the old man – hands still side-by-side on the desk – just smiled. He did it in the most natural and amiable way.

“Do you have a wish, miss, or not?” he asked gently.

“This really did happen,” she said, looking straight at me. “I’m not making it up.”

“Of course not,” I said. She was not the sort of person to invent some goofy story out of thin air. “So . . . did you make a wish?”

She went on looking at me for a while, then released a tiny sigh. “Don’t get me wrong,” she said. “I wasn’t taking him 100 per cent seriously myself. I mean, at 20 you’re not exactly living in a fairy-tale world any more. If this was his idea of a joke, though, I had to hand it to him for coming up with it on the spot. He was a dapper old fellow with a twinkle in his eye, so I decided to play along with him. It was my twentieth birthday, after all: I thought I ought to have something not-so-ordinary happen to me that day. It wasn’t a question of believing or not believing.”

I nodded without saying anything.

“You can understand how I felt, I’m sure. My twentieth birthday was coming to an end without anything special happening, nobody wishing me a happy birthday, and all I’m doing is carrying tortellini with anchovy sauce to people’s tables.”

“Don’t worry,” I said. “I understand.”

“So I made a wish.”

The old man kept his gaze fixed on her, saying nothing, hands on the desktop. On the desk were also several thick folders that might have been account books, plus writing implements, a calendar and a lamp with a green shade. Lying amongst them, his small hands looked like another sort of desktop furnishing. The rain continued to beat against the window, the lights of Tokyo Tower filtering through the shattered drops.

The wrinkles on the old man’s forehead deepened slightly. “That is your wish?”

“Yes,” she said. “That is my wish.”

“A bit unusual for a girl your age,” he said. “I was expecting something different.”

"If it's no good I can wish for something else," she said, clearing her throat. "I don't mind. I'll think of something else."

"No, no," the old man said, raising his hands and waving them like flags. "There's nothing wrong with it, nothing at all. It's just a little surprising, miss. Don't you have something else? Like, say, you want to be prettier, or more intelligent, or rich: you're okay with not wishing for something like that – something an ordinary girl would ask for?"

She took some moments to search for the right words. The old man just waited, saying nothing, his hands at rest together on the desk again.

"Of course I'd like to be prettier, or more intelligent, or rich. But I really can't imagine what would happen to me if any of those things came true. It might be more than I could handle. I still don't really know what life is all about. I don't know how it works."

"I see," the old man said, intertwining his fingers and separating them again. "I see."

"So, is my wish okay?"

"Of course," he said. "Of course. It's no trouble for me at all."

The old man suddenly fixed his eyes on a spot in the air. The wrinkles of his forehead deepened: they might have been the wrinkles of his brain itself as it concentrated on his thoughts. He seemed to be staring at something – perhaps all-but-invisible bits of down – floating in front of him. He opened his arms wide, lifted himself slightly from his chair and whipped his palms together with a dry smack. Settling in the chair again, he slowly ran his fingertips along the wrinkles of his brow as if to soften them and then turned to her with a gentle smile.

"That did it," he said. "Your wish has been granted."

"Already?"

"Yes, it was no trouble at all. Your wish has been granted, lovely miss. Happy Birthday. You may go back to work now. Don't worry, I'll put the trolley in the corridor."

She took the lift down to the restaurant. Empty-handed now, she felt almost disturbingly light, as though she were walking on some kind of mysterious fluff.

"Are you okay? You look spaced out," the younger waiter said to her.

She gave him an ambiguous smile and shook her head.

"Oh, really? No, I'm fine."

"Tell me about the owner. What's he like?"

"I dunno, I didn't get a very good look at him," she said, cutting the conversation short.

An hour later she went to bring the trolley down. It was out in the corridor, utensils in place. She lifted the lid to find the chicken and vegetables gone. The wine bottle and coffee pot were empty. The door to room 604 stood there, closed and expressionless. She stared at it for a while, feeling it might open at any moment, but it did not open. She brought the trolley down in the lift and wheeled it to the dish washer. The chef looked blankly at the plate: empty as always.

"I never saw the owner again," she said. "Not once. The manager turned out to have just an ordinary stomach ache and went back to delivering the owner's meal himself the very next day. I quit the job after New Year and I've never been back to the place. I don't know, I just felt it was better not to go near there, kind of like a premonition."

She toyed with a paper coaster, lost in her thoughts. "Sometimes I get the feeling that everything that happened to me on my twentieth birthday was some kind of illusion. It's as though something happened to make me think that things happened that never really happened at all. But I know for sure that they did happen. I can still bring back vivid images of every piece of furniture and every nick-nack in room 604. What happened to me in there really happened, and it had an important meaning for me, too."

The two of us remained silent, drinking our drinks and thinking our separate thoughts.

"Do you mind if I ask you one thing?" I asked. "Or, more precisely, two things."

"Go ahead," she said. "I imagine you're going to ask me what I wished for that time. That's the first thing you want to know."

"But it seems as though you don't want to talk about it."

"Does it?"

I nodded.

She put the coaster down and narrowed her eyes as though staring at something off in the distance. "You're not supposed to tell anybody what you wish for, you know."

"I won't try to drag it out of you," I said. "I would like to know whether or not it came true, though. And also – whatever the wish itself might have been – whether or not you later came to regret what it was you chose to wish for. Were you ever sorry you didn't wish for something else?"

"The answer to the first question is 'yes' and also 'no'. I still have a lot of living left to do, probably. I haven't seen how things are going to work out in the end."

"So it was a wish that takes time to come true?"

"You could say that. Time is going to play an important rôle."

"Like in cooking?"

"Like in cooking."

I thought about that for a moment, but the only thing that came to mind was the image of a gigantic pie slowly cooking in an oven at low heat.

"And the answer to my second question?"

"What was that again?"

"Whether you ever regretted your choice of what to wish for."

A moment of silence followed. The eyes she turned on me seemed to lack any depth. The desiccated shadow of a smile flickered at the corners of her mouth, suggesting a kind of hushed sense of resignation.

"I'm married now," she said. "To an accountant three years my senior. And I have two children, a boy and a girl. We have an Irish setter. I drive an Audi and I play tennis with my friends twice a week. That's the life I'm living now."

"Sounds pretty good to me," I said.

"Even if the Audi's bumper has two dents in it?"

"Hey, bumpers are made for denting."

"That would make a great bumper sticker," she said.

"Bumpers are for denting'."

I looked at her mouth as she said that.

"What I'm trying to tell you is this," she said, more softly, scratching an earlobe. It was a beautifully-shaped earlobe. "No matter what they wish for, no matter how far they go, people can never be anything but themselves. That's all."

"There's another good bumper sticker," I said. "'No matter how far you go, you can never be anything but yourself'."

She laughed aloud, with a real show of pleasure, and the shadow was gone.

She rested her elbow on the bar and looked at me. "Tell me," she said. "What would you have wished for if you had been in my position?"

"On the night of my twentieth birthday, you mean?"

"Uh-huh."

I took some time to think about that, but I couldn't come up with an answer.

"I can't think of anything," I confessed. "I'm too far away now from my twentieth birthday."

"You really can't think of anything?"

I shook my head.

"Not one thing?"

"Not one thing."

She looked into my eyes again – straight in – and said, "That's because you've already made your wish."

"But you had better think about it very carefully because I can grant you only one." In the darkness somewhere, an old man wearing a withered-leaf-coloured tie raises a finger. "Just one. You can't change your mind afterwards and take it back."
